Bottled water is convenient where water from the tap isn't safe to drink. However, there is a problem with putting water into plastic bottles: huge numbers of empty bottles end up as garbage. That's why the town of Bundanoon in the state of New South Wales in Australia recently stopped selling water in single-use plastic bottles, and is requesting residents to fill their reusable bottles with tap water instead. Now, the state government is supporting the movement by telling its offices to stop buying water in single-use plastic bottles, since it saves both taxpayers' money and the environment.

Like many other countries, Japan is having problems related to its aging society. Making Japan's health care better in a couple of ways would help with some of the problems.

Older people have a higher risk of health problems. However, some of the problems can be prevented if people get enough exercise. For example, if the government had many free gyms for older people, they could exercise and stay healthy. Then, they might have fewer health problems.

Having more doctors and nurses for older people is another way to make health care better. If the government gave those workers more money, more people would want those kinds of jobs. Then, there would be many doctors and nurses to help older people when they have health problems.

For the reasons above, I think health care in Japan should be made better. That should help with some problems that happen in an aging society.
